The equivalent, in English money, of $2,500 was once offered by an old lady in London for the return of a favorite cat which had strayed or been stolen. People called her a "crank," and perhaps she was. It is unfortunate that one of the gentler sex should ever gain this title, for many do. It is, however, frequently not their fault. Often functional derangements will apparently change a woman's entire nature. Don't blame such sufferers if they are "cranky," but tell them to use Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription, which is an infallible remedy for female weaknesses.

CHAPTER IX.

MRS. L. DRANE.

As the train began its rumbling journey into the night Mr. Drane felt a wild exultation. He was escaping from the scenes of the utmost misery he had ever experienced, and he was going to see the most adorable girl in the world. The more he thought of it the more the tramp's story about his marriage appeared to be absolute fiction—and yet, the fellow had been so confident, so unmistakably pleased with his prospects. And Bessie had said that she lived in Buffalo. Was she deceiving him, and Mrs. Bowers, too? It was all very strange. Why had he not taken the precaution to learn the tramp's real name? Had he gone and married Bessie under the name of Drane?

Lawrence shivered. Must he recognize that the tramp had known Bessie in childhood and therefore could not pass himself off under a false name. This was some comfort, but as he puzzled on over the situation he began to doubt whether he had done wisely in running away from his Kansas City friends who had come to New York to find him. Undoubtedly however they would have declared that the story of his adventures was the figment of a disordered brain.

So with perplexities and doubts his exultation gave way to anxiety, and even the prospect of seeing Bessie again failed to relieve his mind of trouble.

It was long past midnight when he reached New Haven. A cab took him to the Beaver House, where he was denied admission because all rooms were taken. Leaving an application for the first vacancy, he found accommodations elsewhere, a sleepy watchman, grumbling immoderately, showing him to a tiny chamber on the top floor. When he came down-stairs in the morning to pay his bill the clerk politely requested him to register, a formality that had been neglected. Certainly he would comply, and with a determination formed in a flash, to sail under true colors, he wrote his name and address with a bold, legible hand. Then he stood before the window, apparently gazing idly into the street, really absorbed in formulating a plan of action. Just as Mr. Drane was registering a shrewd-looking young man with a note-book in one hand and a pencil in the other entered the office. He waited until Lawrence had withdrawn from the counter and then began industriously to copy the names and addresses from the big book. The clerk greeted him jocularly:

"Well, Jimmy, what's the news to-day?"

"Read the Evening Dispatch and find out," was the smart reply.

This brilliant repartee had done service for opening the conversation between the clerk and the shrewd young man daily for many months, and it is probably so serving still. There is nothing like having a witty retort that is warranted not to wear out.

The young man copied rapidly down the page until he came to the last page. Then he paused and scowled an instant, after which he wrote "Lawrence Drane, Kansas City, Mo., No. 346. pd.," very slowly, and turned about slyly to scrutinize the broad back of the gentleman at the window.

"Any thing up, Jimmy?" asked the clerk, observing this action.

Jimmy winked and nodded mysteriously, and began to search among the newspapers lying on the writing table. Presently he found a New York paper of the day before and turned to the account of Mr. Drane's escape and the reward offered for his capture.

"I thought so!" he said, with a triumphant grin, while the clerk looked on in undisguised curiosity. Jimmy gave him no comfort. Instead, he heightened the clerk's emotion by sitting down where he could see Mr. Drane's face and scanning the paper again with frequent glances upward for comparison.

"Mustache gone and clothes different," he muttered; "but it must be the man. I wonder whether he'll become violent and murder me if I speak to him. Perhaps I can invigle him to a police station."

While Jimmy was still debating what to do to "scoop" the boys on a big piece of news and gain a thumping reward, Lawrence turned upon his own course and strolled into the hotel. Jimmy was on the instant alert and interceptor.

Jimmy ran to the nearest telegraph office and sent this dispatch to a New York newspaper: "1,000 words interview with Lawrence Drane, escaped maniac. Very violent. Shall have him locked up in half hour."

This done he returned to the Beaver House, learned that the gentleman had gone up stairs to see a friend, sent a message to police-headquarters and sat down to write a glowing account of the capture, which he regarded as good as consummated, for his local paper and his New York patron. He had directed the answer to his telegram to be sent to the Beaver House and it came just as two stalwart policemen from headquarters reached it. Jimmy began to explain the situation to them, as he opened the envelope, but words failed him as the dispatch his jaw dropped in a way that threatened to spoil his countenance in twain. Thus was the mixture answered.

Don't want it. Must be mistaken. Drane is certainly here. Captured last night.

The policemen growled and poked fun at the reporter, but Jimmy was sure that he was right and argued so earnestly that they consented to pay a walk around that way to look at the alleged Lawrence Drane.

Meantime the victim of this pursuit had scanned the register of the Beaver House on the dates just subsequent to the theft of his clothes and belongings. At a time that corresponded exactly with the tramp's story he was horrified to find this entry:

"Mr. and Mrs. L. Drane, Kansas City."

He learned that "Mrs. Drane" was in and sent up to her a card with his own name scrawled upon it. In due time he was ushered to the door of the best room in the house. He knocked and entered at once.

A richly-dressed young woman ran quickly across the room crying:

"Where have you been? and why—"

She stopped, gave a faint scream and sank into a chair, staring at Lawrence in bewilderment. On his part he felt an immense relief to find that the young woman was not Bessie and bore no resemblance to her except in general figure.

"Madam," he said, "you will pardon this intrusion when I tell you that I am Lawrence Drane, of Kansas City. I think we have both been imposed upon and between us we may be able to set matters right."

"I don't understand you," replied Mrs. Drane, "but you can sit down."

Mr. Drane complied and after a pause began:

"You seem to bear my name, madam, but I am quite certain that you have no right to it. You see, a fellow stole my clothes and money some days ago and proceeded to masquerade around the country under my name, bringing me into all kinds of trouble. I know he came to New Haven, for he collected money here in my name."

Mr. Drane hesitated. "Mrs. Drane" was dreadfully pale and he disliked beyond measure to explain to her that her marriage was invalid and that even were it genuine she had been tricked by a penniless adventurer and criminal.

"I didn't have nothing to do with it," remarked the young woman, faintly.

This language struck Lawrence as strange, coming from a wealthy woman, but her ignorance only made her situation the more pitiable.

"I have no question," he hastened to say, "that you have acted with the utmost innocence in the matter, and it is exceedingly painful for me to tell you that your husband's name is not Drane, and that he is not the wealthy man he represented himself to be."

"Mrs. Drane" was greatly agitated, and in order not further to embarrass her Lawrence rose and walked across the room to a window. A big steamer trunk had been placed there. It was plastered all over with customs slips of various countries, and conspicuous among them was a tag such as is used by passengers wish to have their baggage [illegible] during a voyage. It read:

[illegible]

sist being to possess his supposed wealth.

When at last they started down-stairs, the young woman thrust her hand into his arm and leaned heavily upon him, saying:

"I am so upset by this."

Lawrence gallantly undertook the burden, and as they passed through the office he saw his acquaintance, Jimmy, the reporter, watching him narrowly. Two policemen were there, too, and as he passed them he heard one of them say:

"He does look like a confounded lunatic for a fact."

CHAPTER X.

At all seasonable hours the streets of New Haven are full of pretty girls. They are more girls, too, who like to watch when there is any thing funny in sight. Drane and the [illegible] Mrs. Drane upon his arm, passed some [illegible] of them, or at least he could have sworn that he did, and they all looked out of the corners of their eyes, and grinned with the corners of their mouths.

It is harrowing to be the object of this kind of attention. It suggests the possibility of a practical joke played on one's back, or a black mark alongside one's nose. Drane investigated the subject as well as he could by feeling stealthily around down his back, and using his handkerchief with great vigor. But for the life of him he couldn't find any thing calculated to create so much innocent amusement.

"I suppose I look funny without my mustache," he thought, "but hang me if I should expect people to notice it who never saw me before."

Then he glanced down upon his companion, and beheld upon her countenance an expression which at once explained the situation. She looked as no woman ever does except when she's either sea sick or in love. A honeymoon smile of the most aggravated type transformed her rather comely face into the familiar mask of imbecility; and not even the blank stare with which he met her upturned eyes, moved her to modify a single detail of her ridiculous grimace.

"She must be crazy, too," he thought, with a shudder; unconsciously molding the phrase of his idea to fit the popular judgment regarding his own mental condition. "Poor girl, her disappointment has turned her brain."

She steered him into a side street and just as he was trying to think of a delicate way in which he could urge her to discontinue looking at him in that disquieting fashion, she paused before a gate and said:

"This is the minister's house, the Rev Mr. Knowles, the man who married us, you know."

There was a painful ambiguity about her words which perplexed Drane to such an extent that a servant had ushered them handily into the good pastor's study before he recovered his self-possession.

A venerable gentleman rose from a large chair, and greeted them with courtesy.

"You remember me, don't you?" said the girl, before Drane could open his mouth. "I'm Nellie Blake, or I was before you married me to Mr. Drane, last Tuesday."

She simpered in a most distressing way and looked up at Drane. He felt his hair stirring at the roots, for he saw now that lunacy was the only explanation of the girl's conduct.

"I ought to explain—" he began.

But the minister stopped him with a wave of the hand.

"No explanation is required, Mr. Drane," said he. "I remember you perfectly, and I do trust that nothing has happened in this short space to mar the happiness which I sincerely wished you when I made you one."

"But my dear sir—" cried Drane, in horror. Nellie interrupted him with a giggle.

"You see, sir, it isn't really much of any thing," she said, "and perhaps we ought not to have bothered you about it; but the truth is I've lost the certificate you gave me. I'm just as stupid as I can [illegible] help it."

When young "Dick" Quay openly proclaimed at the Harrisburg convention that it was necessary to his father's vindication that Delamater should be nominated, the young man spiked the entire Republican battery. "Pap wants it," is the key note of the campaign. That is the sum and substance of the platform upon which "Pap's candidate" is making the gubernatorial canvass.

With his customary arrogance Mr. Quay notifies Senator Cameron that if he expects a political future he must contribute $150,000 to the Delamater corruption fund. Mr. Quay estimates the fund necessary at $500,000. The Pennsylvania boss has no notion of leaving the question of vindication to the decision of honest voters. A vindication comes high, but Quay must have it.

THREE CONDITIONS.

Nothing more clearly foreshadows a Democratic victory in November than the unaffected pleasure with which independent Republicans hail the nomination of Pattison. Democratic success in Pennsylvania is conditioned upon three things—united Democracy, Republican defection and a Democratic ticket that well-disposed Republicans can heartily support. In the nomination of Pattison the final requisite was supplied. The other conditions exist.

There are no perplexing matters to disturb Democratic harmony, or provoke dissension among the leaders. The party is united. Ante-convention differences are reconciled. Leaders are not unmindful of the duty imposed on them by the hopeful state of affairs. The rank and file need no incitement to action; they understand the situation and have but a single purpose—realization of the prophecy of present tendencies. There is an uplifting spirit among Democrats that augurs well. Whatever a party's depressing effect of assured defeat is no longer [illegible] Democracy. The [illegible] Apathy and indifference have evaporated [illegible] decency on the Democracy. The campaign will be prosecuted with vigor [illegible] the Democrats have [illegible] hopefulness. But in this campaign confidence is inspired [illegible] ic energies. The [illegible] and animates [illegible] four feet [illegible] from the ranks of enemies.

[illegible] defection is wide spread. In [illegible] county of Tioga defection is patent, and is a proportionately greater in [illegible] extent [illegible] the large class of [illegible] Republicans [illegible] of personal abuse [illegible] of the Republican press which [illegible] Delamater and that refuses to support him.

There is every reason for [illegible] that this alienation is a constant force. Because it embodies a principle it has vitality. The defection does not involve apostasy. The [illegible] Republicans are as much Republicans as they ever were; they are as jealous for the honor and as anxious for the triumph of their party as any body of men can be. But this is that which gives the movement force and character, and invests it with a certain definitive quality. These men are actuated by the highest motives. They believe—very justly—that the honor of their party is most effectually vindicated by making corruption odious. Intrenched as this [illegible] is deeply rooted and the [illegible] to [illegible] by the [illegible] by [illegible] of this [illegible] may be expected to develop [illegible] potential energy in the [illegible]

[illegible] by the [illegible] of Pittsburg [illegible] by [illegible] to the [illegible] by [illegible]

We give in [illegible] of the [illegible] Court House [illegible] Chairman [illegible] at 10:30 o'clock a. m. A [illegible] and [illegible] were [illegible].

A roll call of the State and other delegations [illegible] and [illegible] to the committee on contested seats.

Robley B. Coxe, of Luzerne, was elected temporary chairman by acclamation, and was conducted to the chair by C. [illegible], and Editor Singerly, of Philadelphia. Chairman Coxe's brief address was liberally applauded.

Committees on credentials, permanent organization and platform were appointed, and at 11:30 a. m. a recess was taken to 2:00 o'clock.

During the recess it became apparent that Pattison would control the convention. The Wallace men put up Judge Church for permanent chairman, but he was easily defeated in committee by William F. Harrity, the Pattison candidate.

After recess Permanent Chairman Harrity was escorted to the chair by B. F. Meyers and Levi McQuitten, both Wallace men. Chairman Harrity spoke very briefly and announced the order of business.

The committee on credentials reported seating a majority of the Pattison delegates whose seats were contested.

Chairman Harrity announced that the next order of business was the nomination of candidates for Governor.

Ex-Judge Orvis, of Centre county, took the platform and nominated William A. Wallace, of Clearfield, in a happy speech Ex-Senator Jacobs, of Juniata, seconded the nomination.

William S. Stenger, ex-Secretary of State, took the platform. When he said "I rise to nominate Robert E. Pattison," the convention went wild. Michael J. Ryan, of Philadelphia, seconded the nomination in a speech that was generally applauded.

A. G. Dewalt, of Lehigh, then placed in nomination Robert E. Wright. Dr. McCormick, of Lancaster, presented the name of W. U. Hensel, and Senator Brown, of York, named Chauncey F. Black.

The first ballot as announced by Harrity was as follows:

Pattison	600
Wallace	132
Wright	11
Hensel	19
Black	10
Not voting	1

When the convention got tired shouting, George McGowan, of Philadelphia, moved to make the nomination unanimous. It was seconded by half a dozen men and went through like a breeze.

It was nearly 5 o'clock when Chairman Harrity stated that the next order of business would be the nomination of a candidate for Lieutenant Governor. Cries of "Black and the ticket of '82" arose from all parts of the house. It soon became apparent the ticket of '82 it would be so far as first and second places were concerned. J. J. Maloney nominated Black; Brown, of Indiana, nominated Hannibal K. Sloan, and Steel, of Northampton, nominated Robert E. Wright.

But one roll call was necessary, Black being nominated by a vote of 191 to 157 for Wright and 3 for Sloan.

Pat Foley, of Allegheny, then presented the name of William H. Barclay, of Allegheny, for Secretary of Internal Affairs. The nomination was made by acclamation and the ticket was complete.

When the members of the State Committee met after the convention had adjourned, W. F. Harrity was elected chairman, vice Elliott P. Kisner, resigned. Mr. Harrity accepted the honor for the time being, the general belief being that he will only remain as chairman until Ex-Governor Pattison and he can agree upon some other man for the place.

Most of the Wallace men who remained long enough after the convention to do so called on Pattison to congratulate him and assure him of their support.

THE PLATFORM.

The Democrats of Pennsylvania, by their representatives in the State Convention assembled, renewing their former pledges of fidelity and devotion to the reserved rights of the people and State, do declare:

First. That ballot reform is necessary and to this end we recommend the adoption of such a system as the Australian ballot law.

Second. That tariff reform is necessary in order that both producers and consumers may be relieved from the burden of unnecessary taxation.

Third. That State and local reform is necessary in order that the taxation for county, municipal and township purposes may be equitably adjusted and the unjust discrimination against the land remedied.

Fourth. [illegible] the law requiring the sum [illegible] State treasury shall be invested in State or United States bonds must be observed and enforced.

Fifth. We invite [illegible] of the conservative and [illegible] of Republicanism [illegible] the administration of the [illegible] by the Republican party [illegible] the people for its open [illegible] of the provision of the civil service law [illegible] the President of its choice was solemnly pledged to support for its execution [illegible] promote sectional strife and [illegible] the business tranquility of the country, for its lavish and reckless expenditures of the public money for its passage through the House of Representatives a tariff bill which increases the taxes on the necessaries reduces only those laid upon luxuries and is calculated to promote and foster trusts for its failure to enforce the laws against the importation of contract and pauper labor, for its attempts to pass a Federal election law designed to excite a race war for the elimination and legislation against the agricultural industries which has greatly reduced the value of farm land, for its indifference to the rights of labor, its defeat of the labor bills in the last Legislature, and its failure to enforce articles 16 and 17 of the Constitution by proper legislation.

Sixth. We sympathize with the [illegible] and [illegible] of the farmers of Berks county [illegible] at the Farmers' Institute [illegible] and [illegible] of the [illegible] Experiment Station [illegible] additional [illegible] for the [illegible] particular [illegible] of the lives of miners.

BOWSER AND THE MIND CURE.

How Mrs. B. Attempted to Demonstrate the Theory and Practice of Slightly Unreliable Therapeutics.

After supper the other night Mr. Bowser went to his overcoat pocket and got out a small book and began reading it, and after waiting long enough to let him understand that I had no curiosity on the subject I queried:

"Something new on poultry?"

"No."

"It isn't Hoyle?"

"No."

"Well, what is it?"

"I can tell you the title of it, but you can't understand. It is a very, very deep work."

"Oh, it is! You can understand a very, very deep work and I can't."

"Naturally. Man has the stronger, deeper mind, of course. The title of this work is 'Nature's Diseases and Remedies Control of the Body by the Mind.'"

"Bosh!"

"What! What's that?"

"You are too old to waste time on such nonsense, Mr. Bowser."

"Nonsense! Why, it's the plainest principle of philosophy in the world. The human body is but clay, the soul is immortal. The soul is the mind. The mind ought to be able to control the body."

"Yes, in some cases."

"In all cases, Mrs. Bowser. For instance, you stub your toe. It hurts. You let your mind turn to something else and the pain ceases."

"Humph!"

"That's it! That's the usual way of the ignorant—ridicule what they can't argue and discuss in a sensible manner. I have often wondered if you really had a soul."

"Don't worry yourself, Mr. Bowser. If I haven't got any soul I've got some common sense."

"Very well. It's no use to talk to a person brought up in a log house on the edge of a huckleberry marsh. I know that the mind can control the body. You deny it. I hope to furnish you with proofs within the week."

He was to furnish them that night. We were about ready to go upstairs, and he had been out bareheaded and in his slippers to see if the barndoor was locked, when he suddenly gave a great start and cried out:

"Gee—mi—my to Johnson!"

"What's the matter?"

"That tooth tried to jump clean out of my head. Whew! Yi! Hang it!"

He sat down to hold his jaw and heave to and fro, and I said:

"Your tooth jumps. It hurts you. You let your mind turn to something else and the pain ceases."

He looked up at me with the glint of pounded glass in his eyes, and was about to reply in kind, when the jumper jumped in on him again, and he seized his jaw and yelled:

"Great Scots to scatteration, but I can't stand this! Get me some camphor!"

I got him some, and after a time the pain eased up and he went to bed. He expected me to say something about "Control of the Body by the Mind," but I was waiting. I knew that he wouldn't get off so easily, and could afford to give him a little time. I was just falling asleep when Mr. Bowser suddenly lifted his feet high in air, and uttered a whoop which set a neighbor's dog to barking, followed by the remark:

"Thunder and lightning!"

"Mr. Bowser, are you asleep?" I asked.

"Asleep! No! I'm dead! Say, this infernal thing has come back on me! Where's that camphor?"

"On the bureau, dear, but it won't do you no good."

"Oh-h-h-h! Jewhittaker! My stars and soul, but she's jumping my jaw right out of its socket! I've got to have something done for me or I won't live ten minutes!"

"Pshaw, Mr. Bowser, have some spunk about you!" What is a little toothache?"

"Grit! grit!" he shouted, as he danced around on one leg. "I've got more grit than any ten families like yours rolled together, but this is awful—awful! Are you going to lie there and see me drop dead?"

"You can do as you will. Just lie down and turn your mind at work. Think of something else. Think of being at a May day festival presenting flowers—happy children—"

"Have I got—"

"Just think of the violets blow

No longer the wowers sits and sighs;
No longer the tear of sadness flows,
Or memories throng;
For the gentle tones of mother and child
Are mingled again in the evening mild,
In Angel Band."

MRS. J. G. BUSHELL.

sings Bobby Burns of Madam Nature. He doubtless would have said more specifically had his information reached so far:

She made the Blue Grass to grow O'

Beautiful women are a staple of Kentucky. One takes it as a foregone conclusion, and feels an aggrieved surprise at any deviation from the generally accepted law—fine women, fine horses, fine whisky, a traditional Kentucky trinity, even though the linking of the three may be all but a profanation!

Yet the focusing of all these goodly things is found best in one wide, fertile spot—the Blue Grass region. So, at any rate, her people think. An unhandsome Blue Grass woman is an anomaly.

Last autumn, when a golden glory was over all the landscape and the perennial verdure of the fields was intensified by a brilliant sprinkling of shed leaves, delegates from the Pan-American Congress visited Lexington, the Blue Grass capital.

MISS LILY ROBINSON.

Maj. H. C. McDowell whose home is old historic Ashland, just outside the city and whose wife is the granddaughter of the immortal Henry Clay, tendered the distinguished guests unbounded southern hospitality.

To give the Blue Grass welcome a more characteristic coloring and to grant the foreigners as comprehensive an idea as possible of the glories of the delectable section of country a distribution of local beauties was bidden to grace the scene. The Pan-American Congress was entertained with a fervor and dispatch that [illegible] have taken needed to button up a regiment of men! Now then, for the waist! Humph! that is made the same way all the buttons in the wrong place. No arm-holes, no nothing! Freddy, hold still! I tell you it doesn't hurt you! Yes, 'tis on right. It can't be on the other way. By Jove, I've forgot the drawers, and stockings! Here, put up that foot. Good gracious, Freddy, can't you stop wiggling your toes? Hold your leg stiff. There, now. Now we'll put on the little man's collar. What an outlandish contrivance to fasten a collar. It doesn't stay put anywhere. Let's see, the bow goes under it? No, it must go over it. Keep your head still. What are you bobbing so for? Lift up your arms, Freddy! Why, what the deuce is the matter with this child's arms? He can't move 'em. Don't cry, Freddy. Let me look. Do stop that bawling. This all comes of you mother's humoring you so. I say—Freddy stop this noise! Stop it! I say! I shall be crazy—I—"

And about at this juncture his wife appears on the scene and she finds that Freddy's pant's are hind part before, and one of his arms has been put through the neck space, and the other one through one armhole of his waist, and his collar which was made to button down stands up, and his stockings are on wrong side out; and his pa will never own that there is anything out of order about the proceeding, but the next time he dresses the baby he doesn't dress it—he always has some thing to see to that prevents him.

DUELING IN JAPAN.

Revival of the Old Customs—Fines Imposed to Suppress It.

Dueling, which was universal among the military classes in Japan prior to the revolution of 1868 and which had fallen greatly into disuse subsequent to that event, has of late shown a tendency to revive, says the London Times, and so seriously the government has at last dealt with the matter.
